The totals of fire loss in this country may signify little to the average mind, but the comparative figures should mean much. The figures issued by the national board of fire underwriters show that the average fire loss per capita in the United States for the last five years was $3.02, against 33 cents for six European countries, including France, Germany and Austria. It may be objected perhaps that it is unfair to select this particular period for purposes of comparison, since both the Baltimore fire of 1904 and the San Francisco fire of 1906 are included in it. And yet if these two fires, representing about $350,000,000, were deducted from the total fire loss of the country for the five years—which is estimated at $1,257,716,955—the total would be reduced by but little over a fourth. And the American per capita loss would remain about six and one-half times larger than the European. What is to blame for this great disparity? Are we so much more careless than Europeans? Are European building codes, fire departments and water supplies from six and a half to ten times better than those found in the United States?

That clergyman who preached to the stokers on a liner in a room where it was 130 degrees had no need to mention hell fire.
